

No, no, and no! Broadcasters make plenty of money as it is right now; the FCC has no business mandating that they can infringe on my rights in order to make more! I would rather not have digital tv than give up my rights to record programs and watch them whenever I want.

What the FCC should be mandating is privacy standards for the new digital age. If broadcasters want to know about my viewing habits-- if that information has value to them-- then they should pay me for that information. They should be prohibited from "spying" on me to find out what I'm watching or buying without my express consent.
